Season 3: The UX of life has changed

Khoi Vinh (00:00):

Wireframe from Adobe XD is back. This is a show about how design helps technology fit into our lives. And as we launch our third season, we find ourselves navigating some truly challenging times. The user experience of everyday living has completely changed, so how can good design support us even now? I mean, how we work is different, and where we work from is different.

Doug Collins (00:28):

Welcome to my, uh, 2016 Jeep Renegade, which seemed like a roomy car when I bought it, and it's not as roomy now that I'm working from it, uh, 80 hours this week.

Khoi Vinh (00:38):

And, many of us worry if we'll even be able to work at all.

Drew Davies (00:42):

Design tends to be on the trailing end of this stuff, so I'm a little bit worried about what happens four, six months from now.

Khoi Vinh (00:49):

But tackling difficult problems, that's what design is for. For instance, we're more anxious than ever, and we're home a lot more than ever. Can good design entertain us? Can good design be good for our health?

Lucas Guarneri (01:04):

There's no tension between UX practice and real medicine as long as UX designers don't pretend to do a job that isn't theirs.

Khoi Vinh (01:12):

So many of us need help getting through this. So how can good design help us help each other? How can good design help us choose who is in charge?

Whitney Quesenbery (01:22):

When we say democracy has a design problem, it is all the things that go together to make a fantastic UX experience.

Khoi Vinh (01:29):

And our online lives, where we connect virtually more than ever before. So can design help make those connections simpler and better?

Michelle Brown (01:40):

I realized that my dad's phone was not in fact connected to the wifi in the house.

Ginette Girard (01:43):

Then your father tried to make it work. Well, he couldn't figure it out either.
